SENIOR LIVING OPTIONS
Round Rock & Georgetown

What is Assisted Living?

Assisted Living is an apartment building surrounding a central dining room. Caregivers hired by the community provide help with Activities of Daily Living (ADLs). This care includes medication management, assistance with dressing, bathing and getting around, as well as assistance with all levels of toileting activities, including incontinence. Assisted Living is "custodial care," as opposed to "medical necessity" at a Skilled Nursing Facility. However, an Assisted Living can usually provide heavy assistance all the way through hospice. Activities and socialization are important features as well.

What is Memory Care?

Memory Care is a type of assisted living that specializes in dementia, including Alzheimer's. It is a secured environment for the residents' safety so that they cannot wander away. Staff receives specialized training in how to handle behaviors common to all dementia sufferers. Typically, Memory Care communities are geared up for more intensive caregiving, since this population declines more rapidly than other seniors. Generally, Memory Care is more expensive than Assisted Living. The list on the opposite side of this page includes only licensed Memory Care communities.

What is Independent Living?

Independent Living is an apartment building surrounded by a centralized dining room and a meal plan. Independent Living is organized similarly to Assisted Living, but the community is not licensed to help residents with ADLs like bathing and medication management. This style of elder living is for more active seniors, and the emphasis is on amenities, activities, and socialization instead of additional care. However, an outside agency can still be employed to provide the additional care that residents sometimes come to need.

What is a Personal Care Home?

A Personal Care Home (PCH, sometimes also called a Residential Care Home or a Board and Care) is a licensed Small Assisted Living Community, generally with 5 to 15 beds. These small communities provide three meals a day and help with all ADLs just like larger communities. However, they are most frequently in buildings converted from single-family residences and are in residential neighborhoods. Frequently, the care level is higher, the activities are fewer, and the cost may be lower than in larger Assisted Living communities. Unlicensed PCHs have three or fewer residents.
